

Four months later, EA Sports unveiled FIFA 27, the next instalment of the franchise and its first major leap into the world of augmented reality. The technology revolves around HyperMotion Reality, or HMR, its name for a technology that takes motion capture data, such as is generated for FIFA, and adapts it for virtual environments. It's a technology that allows an external 3D engine to "see" through a player's body and project a 3D avatar on a 2D surface. In FIFA 27, the transfer market, broadcast, the in-game menu screen, and even the pitch are all modelled in HMR. Perhaps in reaction to this, Electronic Arts launches FIFA in October, which - weirdly - features an augmented reality mode in which players wear vests that can be scanned. The result is FIFA for Quest, an augmented reality experience that has players find, scan and place badges into a football club full of their (virtual) teammates. But now, five years after that first version of FIFA went live, players can play the most realistic, most immersive version of the world's most popular football game. Not with another version of the franchise that uses the same content with a few months' difference; with a whole new game. When I sat down to play, my first reaction was, "Jesus Christ, this looks old." Then, more sinister: "No, I'm looking at an OLD graphics pack." I grew up with FIFA. Everyone did. A feeling of anticipation floods you, of happy memories in team colours on the pitch against familiar faces. In my mind, FIFA is the one game that embodies memories of a simpler time. Unfortunately, that's not the case: even a quick glance at the cover shows the game that has been kept up to date with the latest technology. But this isn't the only thing that's changed. To start, players are now rendered in full 3D, with no more cloth-clad humans with generic faces. You can't even tell who anyone is. Players are fully defined characters with their names and faces, so that your favourite footballer can't disappear from your team and re-emerge in full costume as a new opponent. For the first time in EA Sports' history, a single game is responsible for creating the entire range of players. Fifa 13's Career Mode has

I am looking for a way to simulate a slow querying method on messages in a RabbitMQ Queue. I would like to do this so I can simulate a query to a database that takes a long time. I have looked into the manual and I don't see an obvious way of doing this. Thank you A: The message is delivered in the same time it is received. You have an option to queue up processing messages so they get processed at a delayed time. If you want to do it at a connection level, then you need to pause the connection at the time you want the queue to be paused. You can achieve the same thing by using messaging platforms that support tasking like Azure Service Bus. The present invention relates to an object. More particularly, the present invention provides a method and system for managing unsolicited instant messages sent via a pager system using a personal computer. An Instant Messaging service is a form of communication that provides near real
